FUND COMMENTARY

After a robust rally in January, the S&P 500 retreated 2.5% in USD (-0.1% in EUR) this month as US corporates issued cautious outlooks for the year 2023. Closely watched inflation metrics such as the consumer price index (+6.4% in January) fell less than expected, dampening investor hopes of a quick normalisation of monetary policy. Bright spots nonetheless remained in the American economy, as evidenced by a buoyant consumer (retail sales were up 3% despite an increase in the personal savings rate) helped by a record low unemployment rate of 3.4% and an increasing labour participation rate.

We believe our companies are well positioned to enhance worker and supply chain productivity, which is becoming a critical business focus after two years spent managing emergencies.

Meta was the main contributor to portfolio performance in February after its founder announced "the year of efficiency" for 2023, slashing costs and winding down capital investment plans in non-essential ventures. The New York Times registered higher-than-expected subscriber numbers and average revenue per user, lending further credibility to the company's 15 million subscriber objective by 2025 while contemplating a rebound in profitability. On the other hand, Equifax's expectations for its mortgage credit bureau clouded the company's 2023 outlook, pressuring near term performance. Another detractor was Alphabet, whose dominance in search advertising was publicly challenged by Microsoft through AI-driven innovation.

Align Technology was sold in February following its year-to-date rally, whilst Thermo Fisher Scientific was exited on insufficient visibility. Meanwhile, we added Monolithic Power, an innovative pure player in power management semiconductors, and reinforced other existing high conviction names.
