*With regard to exclusions on nuclear weapons, issuers based in states that have adhered to the "Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty" stipulated on 1 July 1968 are not considered.

Investment Manager Commentary

Market Development

The European equity market performed well in February. Against a backdrop of rising interest rates, global equity markets continued to rally, supported by the ongoing strength of the artificial intelligence theme, which was boosted by Nvidia's earnings results. Inflation data turned higher in January, driven by some seasonal factors, but highlighting that the final phase of the return to target may be slower. Against this backdrop, the bond market essentially halved expectations for central bank rate cuts (from 6 to 3 for the Fed), even though growth remained solid. Corporate earnings, other than technology, were less than spectacular but still in line with or ahead of lowered expectations, albeit accompanied by more reassuring commentary than in the previous quarter. Parts of the industrial and consumer goods sectors have largely cleared excess inventories, in line with recent PMI index readings that point to a somewhat improving economy. Consistent with this picture, the best performers were the automotive and industrial sectors, which matched the return of the technology sector. At the bottom of the league table were the defensive sectors, which bore the brunt of the combined effect of negative earnings revisions and rising interest rates.

Performance and Investment Choices

At a sector level, exposure to industrials was increased during the month, while exposure to utilities and non-cyclical consumer staples was further reduced. The Fund's performance was positive, slightly outperforming the benchmark, with a positive contribution from the overweight in technology and some healthcare stocks.

Outlook and Investment Strategy

At the current stage, the Fund's sector allocation appears to be balanced overall.
The Fund maintained a constructive view on equities against a baseline scenario of gradually easing inflation and central banks starting to cut interest rates in early summer. Both equity exposure and the preference for the "growth" component could be increased in view of a confirmation of a reversal in monetary policy, which could create conditions for an increase in the valuation multiples of European indices.
