Fund manager's commentary

- The market is shifting beyond large-cap dominance, with positive signs in both the US and UK, particularly in the lower market capitalization ranges
- UK companies are actively improving returns, investing, and engaging in buybacks and strategic divestments to unlock value
- Increased M&A activity, particularly from industry players, indicates growing confidence in the outlook and potential for bidding wars

February was a fascinating month for markets and one that we could potentially look back on as portending an important signal. Although Nvidia will attract lazy headlines, it is understandable given its size, significance and totemic status as the AI bellwether; beneath the surface, the internals show real evidence of change. In the US, we are seeing clear signs of broadening out, both as the Magnificent Seven starts to differentiate and fragment, but more significantly, where the vibrancy is finally distilling down to the lower market capitalisation ranges. The UK hasn't quite seen that yet, but there are clear and notable straws in the wind that it is about to do so. Domestic corporates, though, are not sitting on their hands and waiting for change to come to them; they are proactively doing something about it.

The valuation disconnect that has persisted for so long is finally being confronted. Companies are re-focusing, improving returns, and investing confidently, while hoovering up their equity at distressed multiples. For example, Barclays, which return nearly will return nearly 50% of its market capitalisation over the next three years in buybacks or distributions (a playbook most of its banking peers are also adhering to) or BP, which is stepping up its own buyback to a cadence of an incredible $3bn per quarter. Meanwhile, unleashing hidden value through sales of non-core subsidiaries at meaningful premiums is another crowd pleaser, with Marlowe PLC selling one for more than its entire market capitalisation, while ITV, Ascential and JOHCM UK Growth small holding Globaldata have also been busy in that department, and there are plenty more who could follow.

But even all this has been overshadowed by the thundering cavalry of corporate buyers coming over the hill. Last year was busy for UK incoming M&A, but a notable feature of the landscape was that 61% of transactions were by financial buyers. This year, while they haven't gone away, they have been joined by industry. This is a very important development. Trade buyers typically need disproportionate confidence in the outlook environment before moving, so their actions are an unambiguous positive indicator. But these buyers can also extract synergies and synergies can justify higher premiums and arouse rival interest for that very reason. Bidding wars can be the result, as we have seen at Wincanton, Currys and Kin & Carta, amongst many others. JOHCM UK Growth, if history is any guide, should be a significant beneficiary of this development, and it is worth remembering that the fund is currently in receipt to two live approaches. We would not be surprised to see more.

Newsflow over the month was strong, save for an unfortunate contract cancellation at Gooch and Housego (entirely beyond their control), which temporarily blurred the powerful growth trajectory but had no impact on its medium-term prospects. Recall the company is embedded in the new advanced range of ASML EUV semiconductor machines, a critical enabler of the AI revolution. That company announced a huge pick up in orders and saw some €60bn added to its market cap; G&H, which benefits from that same order book, actually went backwards on the news. It's stunning but just another live example of the dysfunctionality (and massive opportunity) littered around the UK landscape. Elsewhere, excellent results from Rolls Royce continued to push on the stock price, and we are somewhat regretting a bout of premature profit taking we succumbed to earlier in the year; there is more than enough here, despite the run, to be patient with the rest. Renishaw and Alphawave also posted confident outlooks and Standard Chartered was very pleasing. Finally, geospatial software business OneSpatial announced a key strategic contract win that could open the doors to meaningful, high-quality recurring revenue streams and hopefully, the catalyst to close the inordinately large discount to its comparable peers.
