Investment Manager Commentary

Market Development

Q1 GDP printed at 5.3%, exceeding the consensus expectations. However, the recovery is uneven: Investment spending aside from the property sector accelerated in March, boosted by ongoing policy support, while industrial production growth and retail sales both decelerated which showed that the economic revival is still bumpy. Property investment remained a big drag, despite a higher trading volume, the housing prices are falling continuously, and we are not seeing the bottom in the near term. The PBOC's intention to buy sovereign bonds ensured stronger monetary and fiscal coordination. Recently, the news that the PBOC will buy sovereign bonds from the second market has caught investors' attention and triggered market's discussion about whether it is the Chinese version of QE. Both the MOF and the PBOC have clarified that the operation is one of the normal monetary tools, focusing on smoothing the liquidity when the issuance of special bonds ramps up. In April, buying demand accelerated amid loose onshore market liquidity and delayed sovereign bonds issuance. Against this backdrop, both term spreads and credit spreads compressed to a historically low levels, whereby the ultra-long-end government bond yields traded below the MLF rate of 3.5%, which is considered as an anchor for long-end government bond yields and Tier2 bank bond yields declined to the same level as AAA+ credits despite a subordinated feature. We have started to turn alert on onshore bonds as sovereign bond and local government bond issuance may start to speed up and more supportive fiscal details are expected in the coming weeks which could lead to better data in Q2. Despite Fitch's changed China outlook, following Moody, the credit spreads of China IG credit remained stable due to limited new supply and a lack of attractive alternative assets. Although the spread of actively traded names is touching the lows, the absolute yield is still attractive on the back of the rising benchmark rate. Thus, we saw Chinese onshore investors stepping in on market weakness, cushioning volatility.

Performance and Investment Choices

The Fund's performance in April was positive. Due to the easing liquidity and unsatisfactory March data, the onshore bond yields traded down for most of the time in April. However, a central bank report warning bond investors that bond yields were too low has quickly turned sentiment around at the end of the month. We swiftly adjusted our onshore duration according to the market sentiment. At the end of the month, we have a short onshore duration compared to the benchmark. We also trimmed credit positions, given the historically low credit spreads. We maintained the offshore bonds position. On the currency front, we reduced long-EURUSD positions. Lastly, we maintained a higher ESG score than the benchmark and kept improving our ESG score.

Outlook and Investment Strategy

Onshore bond yields traded down rapidly in April and then retreated. As we advance, we believe that the economic fundamentals, liquidity conditions, and asset shortages will not change noticeably. However, the issuance of special sovereign bonds and announcements of more stimulus details may somehow weigh on onshore bonds. We will remain cautious in the near term by maintaining a short onshore duration compared to the benchmark and adjusting the curve in time. We will also maintain the offshore credit exposures in anticipation of lower US Treasury yields. On the currency front, we still believe that China's external surplus is too large for the renminbi to remain weak indefinitely. Finally, we will maintain the portfolio ESG score above the benchmark.
