Fund manager's commentary

- European markets started strong in 2024, led by the tech sector, despite bond yield fluctuations and ECB's cautious stance on rate cuts
- Economic indicators varied, with mixed GDP results and concerns over US regional banks
- The fund outperformed the benchmark, driven by strong stock picking driving returns, notably in materials and healthcare, while utilities weakened due to falling electricity prices

European markets made a solid start to 2024, propelled by excellent performance by the technology sector. Bond yields made a strong upward inflection for most of the month before regressing in the final week. Central bank comments were more in the direction of delaying the timing of the first rate cut, with the European Central Bank's (ECB) Lagarde stating the ECB remains 'data dependent, not date dependent'. European inflation came in at 2.9% for December after 2.4% in November. However the fall in electricity prices will be putting further downward pressure in the coming quarters. Euro area GDP remained unchanged in Q4 2023, disappointing in Germany but exceeding expectations in Spain and Italy. We saw a stronger-than-expected Manufacturing PMI at 46.6 for January, whilst Services were sequentially weaker at 48.4. Concerns surrounding US regional banks rose late in the month after NY Community Bancorp made a $552m provision against commercial real estate exposure. On the geopolitical front, we saw Turkey approving Sweden's accession to NATO.

The fund outperformed in January, with strong stock picking driving returns. Materials and health care were the two standout sectors over the month, empowered by strong returns in CRH and Novo Nordisk. ASML was the highest attributing stock over the period after delivering exponentially strong order intake in Q4, and the 2025 recovery may yet be slightly brought forward into 2024. There remain many proclamations about the lack of market breadth, more so in the US than Europe, but it would be foolhardy not to recognise some of these high index-weighted stocks have incredibly strong fundamentals at still justifiable valuations. Utilities were weak over January, exacerbated by the continued fall in electricity prices on the back of lower gas and carbon prices; RWE reduced its guidance on the back of these effects. Airbus confirmed it managed to outperform its full-year 2023 delivery targets, which many had doubted and remains at a very interesting turning point in the growth of its production cycle.
