FUND COMMENTARY

The S&P 500 continued its upward path in February with markets once again being buoyed by good macroeconomic data and a steady unemployment rate holding at 3.7%, outperforming market forecasts. The Manufacturing PMI also continued to increase, coming in higher than market expectations. On a more negative note, inflation decelerated slightly less than expected at 3.1% for January which partially tempered market optimism regarding the speed of future interest rate cuts.

Our companies benefitted from a mostly upbeat earnings season. Meta Platforms reported strong results, with revenues up 25% and earnings per share up more than 200% in Q4. The company is reaping the reward from the combined reacceleration of its topline thanks to the success of the Reels format and its strict cost controls implemented during the 2023 "Year of Efficiency". Meta also continues to make heavy investments in chips and data centers whilst also being a serious contender in the AI race.

Vulcan Materials, an aggregates producer, reported impressive results with earnings surging almost 40%, highlighting its remarkable pricing power. We believe the company remains poised to benefit from extensive plans to upgrade American infrastructures in the coming years.

Overall, top portfolio contributors for the month included Meta Platforms, Eli Lilly and Vulcan Materials, whilst New York Times, Apple and Warner Music detracted.

Over the next few months, we expect markets to remain fixated on the pace of inflation deceleration and potential interest rate cuts. However, we believe that trying to predict these in today's increasingly woven global economies may be a fool's errand. Instead, we prefer to keep doing what we do best: analysing business models and competitive advantages to identify what we believe to be high-quality companies with clear, long-term growth potential.
